"What humans call love and what Buddhists know to be compassion are two sides of the same coin in this instance. Arunashik ("Bearer of the Sword") is firstborn of Queen Hinadan and the mortal Princess Sahadeva, and is the General of the army of the Sword. Arunashik's training with his cousin and instructor, Prince Toboron, is intensive—the two young men have become fast friends. The apprentices' training is hard, but safe. When Toboron (Aubrey VanDer Straeten) is mysteriously murdered, the kingdom faces the high possibility of civil war as Arunashik and two military commanders loyal to their sovereign queen are pitted against one another. Arunashik finds himself battling his military commander in a conflict for the throne. As the armies grow strong, Arunashik is asked to choose between wielding the sword as a weapon in the darkness, or to look to the Law of the Gods and the Buddha in search of truly living. Arunashik is destined to be a hero, but will he be a hero with honor or a

"But surely you do not doubt the truth of the Buddha's words?" she asked him. He did not answer and she sighed. When he did speak, his voice was weak and carried that exhausted sighing quality. He said nothing more and she continued: "You do not really believe that the last days were some kind of mistake,
